Though the base of traditional Protestant and fiscally conservative middle-American Republicans remains in the GOP, Beck said new middle and upper-class voters are moving toward the party.

I think a lot of voters made their decision based on their moral compass, but I don't think so-called faith issues played a major role," Mauk said, adding that the economy and national security played large roles in the election.

Those are the traditional issues of concern, but it's very clear the totals ... were strong among people in the faith community," Mauk said. "This is very much an election between two starkly different philosophies of government.

Campaign trail ends with no winner on election night

By Lindsay Holmwood Lantern staff writer 11.03

Republicans were breathing a slight sigh of relief election night as two out of the three major networks were projecting George Bush as emerging victorious and securing another four years in the White House.

At the time of publication, NBC and ABC were predicting a victory for Bush citing Ohio and New Mexico as states the president would carry, locking up the necessary 270 votes in the electoral college to win.

The Kerry campaign, however, was not willing to concede a victory to Bush. Campaign spokeswoman Mary Beth Cahill said 250,000 votes needed to be counted in Ohio and the campaign was confident that once these votes were counted Kerry would secure Ohio's 20 electoral

OSU looking beyond skies

Ohio State astronomers are moving into the future and catching a glimpse of the past.

The dedication ceremony for the Large Binocular Telescope took place this quarter. Located at the Mount Graham International Observatory in Arizona, the telescope is an essential tool for doing front-line research in astronomy, said Richard Pogge, professor of astronomy. OSU President Karen A. Holbrook publicly opposed the amendment last month because of its implications for the university. On Oct. 1 Ohio State put into effect a health-care benefit package for same-sex domestic partners of staff and faculty. There are currently 61 members who receive these benefits.

"Domestic partners at OSU will certainly lose benefits. ... This is a huge disappointment for civil rights and for education in Ohio," Undergraduate Student Government Senator Nick Benson said. "I'm not surprised by the outcome, but I did not think it was going to pass by such a huge margin.

Benson said OSU is the only university in the Big 10 to not offer such benefits, and the act will hurt OSU's ability to retain talented faculty and remain competitive with other universities. He blames the results on uninformed voters.

Students continuing to judge animals

By Matt Drummond Lantern staff writer 10.7

While many Ohio State students spend their weekends watching football, studying or hanging out, members of the general livestock judging team are busy selecting and evaluating livestock.

Livestock judging involves the evaluation of beef cattle, sheep and hogs and within those species it includes both market animals and animals meant for course is a prerequisite to join the team breeding, said Tom Turner, professor of animal sciences and coach of the team.

Nana-nezer's Christmas list: No icicle lights or toy madness

Just call me Nana-nezer Scrooge. Even as my roommates try to force-feed me the Christmas spirit with colored lights, musical classics from generations ago and — if Andy actually follows through with this - a stocking with my name on it.

I think there are two main types of holiday people: those who throw themselves into the spirit of the season, of giving and receiving and family and love — and those who can see through the shallow veneer society presents us about Christmas. Ûnlike some people I've known, the religious aspect doesn't matter. I'm all for making Christmas more about Christ, even if the original reason for using Dec. 5 was a pagan celebration called Saturnalia (and those pagans would love how far from Christianity Christmas has moved). The idea of God's love makes me less ill then the relentless capitalism that has forever ruined Christmas for me. In addition, it disappoints me that we give such short shrift to Hannukah and Ramadan when it was happening during the holiday season (apparently because it's based on the lunar calendar). Other religions count too.

What makes me so critical of capitalist Christmas? The fact that it has ruined and perverted nearly every aspect of the holiday season. Christmas advertisements and promotions for stores now start almost immediately after Halloween. There's nothing more depressing to me than to see that familiar green and red on television or hear the jingling of sleigh bells on Nov. 1

Or those damned icicle lights. Those things are a design abomination. Either use fancy, colored lights or plain white ones. Icicle lights try to have the cake and eat it too, but just end up vomiting ugliness all over the front porches of any houses who hang

Think about it. When was the last good Christmas music CD was released? The last good Christmas song that comes to my mind is "Do They Know It's Christmas?" and that was 20 years ago. Speaking of which,

Icicle lights try to have the cake and eat it too, but just end up vomiting ugliness all over the front porches of any houses who hang them there's a new one out now, and the bands performing on it make me cry. Travis? Joss Stone? Chris Martin? They might as well drag Bob Geldof out of mothballs and let him have a go (oh wait, they

The same goes for Christmas movies. "Bad Santa" and "Elf" show promise of potentially being classic Christmas movies, but what is there before that? "Home Alone" is nearly 15 years old and Macaulay Culkin is an adult getting pulled and arrested for marijuana possession in Oklahoma — and where the hell has Daniel Stern been? (in "Rookie of the Year" and "City Slickers" movies, apparently) Before "Home Alone" you have to look back to "A Christmas Story" to find another classic Christmas movie. Two classics in nearly 20 years? I think the reanimated corpses of Irv Berling, Fred Astaire and James Stewart could create a better holiday classic even as undead zombies.

What's the most culturally significant thing to come out of Christmas seasons past? The idea of the "hot toy." Yeah, there were hot toys during Christmases in the 1980s (hello, Cabbage Patch Kids!) but nothing like the yearly march in the '90s. You had Furbys, Beanie Babies, Pogs, Tickle-Me Elmos and Pokemon (and some of these might have been during the same year). What's popular this year? I would like to say a home Russian Roulette kit, but I really don't know

If I had my way, no one would ever give me another present again (and I would never have to figure out a gift for dad that won't end up in the closet), but humanity is much less cold and cynical than I am. So I'll just get my presents, give presents to others and mutter through the entire ordeal. Then thank God that there's only a week left in 2004. Then wait for them to start counting down to Valentine's Day. I really can't win.

Small town appeal missing at Easton

Over the weekend I had the misfortune of driving to Easton Town Center, nestled in the corporate prairie lands of suburban Columbus. "Misfortune" might be overstating it, as I admit Easton is unsurpassed in Central Ohio for shopping pleasure and convenience, and Banana Republic's 15-percent-off deal certainly didn't afflict any wounds.

But Easton represents, to me, a low point in America's addiction to theme parks that attempt to capture another place's reality. Much like Disneyland, Easton imitates the essence of a town, complete with public fountains, park benches, narrow streets and outdoor restaurant seating. In actuality, Easton is nothing more than a freshly painted, suburban shopping mall that went to extravagant lengths to make you feel as if you were someplace meaningful.

Easton asks us the question: "Why should we bother building and conserving real town centers when it's more pleasant and cost effective to build fake ones?" I was most conscious of this dilemma when I rode my bike to Easton over the summer.

Easton represents, to me, a low point in America's addiction to theme parks that attempt to capture another place's reality.

only to find out that the "town" doesn't have a bike rack. I was gawked at by confused shoppers as I circled the "town," looking for something to lock my bike to without risk of confiscation. My world view has been overhauled the past few years. Before coming to Ohio State, I. lived in the German city of Darmstadt (about the size of Akron) for two years. There, the biases of my suburban childhood were confronted by what I viewed as a much more sustainable urban environment, built around a functional town center. I've since come to believe that the sprawling of America's suburbs is our nation's most pressing problem.

For all its fraudulence, Easton reminds us of the necessity of public space. Historically we've had a good understanding of the importance of public space in both the vitality of the urban environment and its crucial role in our human need to connect with each other. From the public markets of ancient Greece and Rome to the pedestrian centers of modern-European cities, public spaces have served as places to interact with people of all colors and economic backgrounds, as well as starting points for carrying out our daily errands.

The suburban shopping mall accomplishes part of this by streamlining our shopping, but it preselects with whom we come into contact. This is also a trait of the suburban subdivision, which often serves as a fenced-in enclave for the advantaged, who rarely need to see the less fortunate. The homeless aren't welcome in the "town" of

When did we stop caring about our real town centers and streets, and when did it become permissible to separate ourselves socioeconomically in every aspect of our lifestyles? In many ways, we didn't have much of a choice. Homebuilding companies realized long ago the efficiency and profit of producing hundreds of woodframed houses on old farmland in massive development projects. Suburban city councils recognized the potential tax revenue of such developments, as well as revenue from neighboring business parks and shopping malls looking to be closer to the subdivisions and to escape rising rents in city centers.

As a result, these same suburbs have more money to build better schools. Parents want their kids in those school districts, and the sprawl continues unabated. Cities struggle to pay for widened roads and other infrastructure, and revenue from further commercial development covers the cost. The cycle seems unstoppable.

Near OSU, the South Campus Gateway project on High

Street will contain a vibrant mix of apartments, shops, restaurants and open public space all accessible by foot and bike from other neighborhoods. Though it's geared toward students, I believe Gateway can demonstrate the effectiveness of turning failed developments of the past into vibrant, economically viable centers of the future. I hope this serves as a model for suburbs and city centers alike.

So next time you're visiting the "town" of Easton, take a look at the decorative windows adorning the fake second floors above the shops and restaurants and ask yourself, where do we go from here? For those of you whose idea of the American Dream includes the culde-sac driveway, I beg you to study abroad for a year. Maybe your world view will be overhauled as well, maybe your American Dream can be revised and maybe our nation's cities and suburbs can still be

Next time, fix election bugs

Well, it's finally over. After months of being bombarded by political commercials, campaign flyers and constant prerecorded phone messages on voice mail, Election 2004 has ended. I can tell you, for me it was definitely a long night. My feet are still sore from standing in line to vote and my head is still whirling from the outcome. Regardless of the final count, I was incredibly impressed at the amazing turnout at the polls. Kudos to all of you who exercised your right to vote, especially if you were a first-time voter.

However, I also have to say that I am just baffled by how disorganized, antiquated and unfair our voting system is. Our country was based on a foundation of democracy, giving the constitutional right that all citizens are allowed the opportunity to vote. Yet here we are in the year 2004 and we still do not have a controlled, foolproof system for this to happen. Although improvements have been made in recent years, our country was still plagued with problems on Election Day: Not enough polling locations, broken machines, misleading or impossible to read punch card ballots, not enough provisional ballots, absentee ballots arriving after the election, polls shutting down early and unbelievably long lines. Many people were simply unable to vote. In our technologically advanced age, how is it that we cannot come up with a better voting system?

I have a hard time understanding how all of these major problems are simply dismissed as "unavoidable." Let's think about this for a moment. Many were denied the chance to vote because of registration "mishaps" that couldn't verify the voter, their address or their correct polling location. Now, if I move I can guarantee you my student loan company will be able to find me within 30 days and send me my payment booklet. If I send in my income tax check from California instead of Ohio, do you really think the government will throw out my check because it was not sent from the area I live in? As for verifying identity, has no one in Washington watched an episode of "CSI?" Fingerprints, DNA, retinal scans — it's all here.

Another issue is our archaic voting system. Many, especially in poor neighborhoods, still vote on inadequate punch card systems. If a precinct is fortunate enough to have electronic voting, the machines are constantly breaking down or not working properly.

The government has stated that there simply isn't enough money to update these voting systems. If money is the restricting factor, then consider this: If you took just 1 percent of the millions of dollars spent on political campaigns, there would be plenty of money to establish a modern, fair voting system. The government seems to have no problem charging us sales tax. Why can't there be a tax on campaign spending?

The U.S. government goes out of its way to be sure that every one of us pays our taxes and obeys the laws, yet they do very little to make our voices heard fairly on Election Day. We, the people are electing them, the leaders. Instead of us scrambling around trying to get to the polls and fighting for our right to vote, they should be going out of their way to ensure that we all have to opportunity to vote. If it is the fundamental right for every American citizen to vote, then each state should be prepared to accommodate every citizen on the first Tuesday of November, regardless of previous turnout. By basing our country on the Constitution, the government has essentially agreed that this is promised to us. I say if the majority of voters do not register a vote, then the election should be called invalid and run again. How is an election fair and impartial if over half the people do not or cannot vote?

Double your linguistic prowess

This past weekend I had the pleasure citizens with respect, it sends the mesof interviewing a Mexican-American kindergarten teacher for a Spanish project. Over the course of the interview one of the topics that came up was her attempt to teach her students Spanish. She noted both how much they enjoyed these lessons and also how unfortunate it was that after they left her classroom, their Spanish instruction was halted usually until high school.

This is evidence of a serious flaw in the American educational system. According to the National PTA, only 25-30 percent of all American elementary schools — public or private — offer foreign language instruction.

Young children have the ability to learn foreign languages like native speakers; they do not have to study grammar the way older students do. Most people after the age of 10 lose the ability to learn a language in this manner. After each person crosses this threshold they are forced to study the grammar of a language.

This type of study is less effective. Students must study longer and rarely are able to truly attain the proficiency of a native speaker. By not beginning foreign language instruction at a younger age, American students are already at a disadvantage when compared to other nations.

Learning a foreign language is important for several reasons. First, it promotes cultural diversity. The United States, because of its heavy international involvement, has a responsibility to educate its citizens about other cultures and their unique perspectives and traditions. Language is one of the most important expressions of a culture the ability to communicate with someone through their native tongue shows an appreciation for who they are and where they come from.

The U.S. Air force Academy has foreign language requirements for cadets because it believes that members of the armed forces are "ambassadors" to other countries — by treating foreign sage that Americans want to help, not to colonize or occupy. This attitude is going to be essential in rebuilding Iraq.

Second, America is a multilingual society participating in a global economy. It is professionally advantageous to be able to speak another language.

This summer 10 Mexican workers died in a fire in Ohio — their apartment complex housed a large Spanish speaking population. Emergency service workers and members of the medical profession need to have multilingual people on their staffs in order to serve this community.

Learning a foreign language reinforces academic skills. It helps students improve their listening proficiency. In order to understand the nuances, patterns and rhythms of a language a student has to be acutely aware of what they are hearing. Lecture-formatted classes make listening a critical skill for all students. English speakers who study romance languages often enjoy an increased vocabulary. Romance languages are derived from Latin, and over half of all English words are from Latin. These languages have a wealth of cognates and as a result, learning them augments a student's vocabulary. A large vocabulary enhances reading and writing skills and also helps students perform better on the verbal portions of standardized tests.

With all of these benefits, foreign languages should be treated as a critical part of the American K-12 curriculum. Instead they are being treated like an afterthought. Our K-12 system needs to be reworked so that foreign language instruction begins at a much earlier age and students are able to best take advantage of these classes. We live in a world that calls for multilingual people and our educational system should be preparing students to enter that world.

Bush win needs to unite America

The race to the White House is over. George W. Bush was reelected to lead the nation for the next four years. The result of the election was indeed stunning. Bush got 51 percent of the popular vote, winning by more than 3 million votes and carrying 31 states.

The result of the election left the Democratic Party in near shambles. The Democratic Party lost the presidency and any control in the legislative arm of the government. The Republican Party now has a 55--to-45 member control over the senate. The Democratic defeat at the polls was such that even the minority leader, Sen. Tom Daschle, D-S.D. lost his senate seat. Election Tuesday was full of surprises.

Most analysts had predicted a large voter turnout and subsequently a Kerry victory at the polls. In fact a large turnout normally ensures a Democratic victory, but this election was like none other. The voter turnout was tremendous, with long lines at almost every polling station. Early exit polls had confirmed a large voter turnout and were assuring a Kerry victory. The exit polls were right about the turnout but were dead wrong on the Kerry victory as President Bush raked in a majority of the votes.

Bush got re-elected for other reasons besides the war on Iraq or the economy or the state of the national deficit. On Election Day, Americans were faced with other choices that influenced their choice. For instance, Ohio had the gay-marriage issue on the ballot, and these moral issues became the focus of the day. Conservative Americans came out en masse to protect their moral standards. and Kerry's ambivalence on moral issues made their decision for the presidency relatively easy.

The choices in this election became dynamic as Election Day got closer. At the outset, the choices were John Kerry or George Bush. It then changed to pro-Bush or anti-Bush, totally eliminating the Massachusetts senator from the equation. Kerry had no position or every position on any issue, and Americans were forced to debate solely on President Bush's position. This created severe problems for Kerry, as it totally undermined his relevance to the election process. On important or debatable matters, Kerry simply became the other candidate who was not Ralph Nader.

On the eve of the election, the choice had become liberals vs. conservatives. Finally, on Election Day it was a religious or moral choice. Unfortunately for the Democrats, they have ceded all religious and moral responsibility to the Republican Party. In situations where moral issues outweigh the economic concerns, or when both candidates seem equally matched on the economy, the Republicans snatched victory with moral values. With one-third of Americans being evangelical Christians it is obvious religious and moral standards do matter.

Kerry represented a change for Americans, but more than 59 million Americans did not want that change. The Bush campaign painted Kerry as a liberal who intended to change the American moral standards, and most Americans bought the idea hook, line and sinker. However, the election is now in the rear-view mirror, and Americans have to come together to build a stronger and more united nation.

Bush has a huge task ahead of him, and we should give him all the support we can. Bush has to work harder than ever before. His administration needs to cut down on its apparent lack of organization and planning. I know Bush has the strength and will to fight for the interest and safety of Americans, but in the war on terror mere strength and will do not achieve much. The Bush administration needs to think ahead and always be two steps ahead of the opposition.

The Democratic Party should continue to strive to achieve its objectives. They have lost this election, but they should not lose their will to continue the fight for a better America. Every government needs some opposition to keep it on its toes, and the Democrats certainly bring quality opposition.

I was one of the many who thought Bush was the better choice, but I will not hesitate to fault him when he makes mistakes. Democracy requires constructive opposition and President Bush should expect his fair share.

Need a moral compass? Turn off ESPN

For the uninitiated, this is a sports column, making me a sports columnist. From this, you've probably already assumed that I'm single, don't care much about my appearance and have no discernible life. You'd be correct.

However, that's not all. In fact, you're missing the most important part: As a sports columnist, I'm uniquely qualified to act as a social and moral compass for this decaying nation. Hey, stop laughing, it's not that farfetched. If you've been following sports recently, you've noticed my brethren having a field day doing just that.

Exhibit A has been illustrated by the wonderful football team of our very own Ohio State University and Stewart Mandel of Sports Illustrated. In case you missed it, our football program has been under a bit of scrutiny lately. This prompted Mandel to take it upon himself to suggest, in print, that our beloved president, Karen A. Holbrook, should shut down the university's athletic department for a year.

Wow, thanks Stewart. Way to take the moral high road, instead of the making-any sense-at-all road." Have fun telling the women's soccer team they won't have a season next year and that their athletic scholarships are revoked. But don't worry, your moral stand makes you a real hero.

This was nothing compared to the aftermath of the Pistons-Pacers "riot" in Detroit two weekends ago. I've done my best to avoid any coverage of this, because I feared that talking heads' would be tripping over themselves in a mad rush to tell me what's wrong with America today. From the little coverage I've seen, I

Ian O'Connor of USA Today wrote that we're a "culture that knows no outrage." "Don't tell me this is part of sports, life or any kind of world I want to be in," fumed Jay Mariotti of ESPN's "Around the Horn." It's gotten so bad that even Norman Chad says we need a "massive re-socialization." Norman Chad? He's a poker commentator whose repertoire consists mainly of bad ex-wife jokes.

How did we get into a situation in which sportswriters are telling us what is right and wrong with society? We're just a bunch of sloppy guys in mismatched suit coats and jeans waiting for the free buffet. We're the experts on the morals of society now?

Well no, we're not. We're just a bunch of idiots who think we know what we're talking about. We spend most of our time hanging out with other sportswriters. Our other societal interaction is with, of course, athletes. In case you haven't noticed, the gist of those conversations is "we're just going to take it one game at a time." This isn't exactly a solid representation of

So if we don't know what we're talking about, how did this happen?

As usual, I blame ESPN. The success of "Pardon the Interruption" led ESPN into the abyss of sports punditry. The show is so well done and entertaining that ESPN decided to turn the entire network into a bunch of segments of talking heads arguing with one another.

Believe it or not, "SportsCenter" used to do stories about sports before it was decided that they'd get better ratings if Sean Salisbury made fun of John Clayton for five minutes. Now, we have "Around the Horn," "Four Downs," and "Fact or Fiction," all of which revolve around pundits arguing with each other.

In turn, a mushrooming of talking heads has infected the network, and predictably, some of them are lecturing heads. Mariotti and Skip Bayless of "Cold Pizza" jump to mind immediately, although the king of all lecturing heads is without a doubt Mike Lupica, who combines overly preachy rants on "The Sports Reporters" with an extremely loud and obnoxious personality.

Remember, these people are full of it. Don't ever listen to any sports journalist when they're on one of their holier-than-thou rants — they're

In fact, next time you turn on ESPN and have some whiny commentator preaching to you, feel free to throw a beer at his head the next time you see them at a sporting event. Then we'll see whose moral compass is going off.

Jeff Svoboda urges you not to throw beer at him until he's 21 so he can at least drink it if he catches it. The junior in journalism and political science can be reached for comment at

Tarblooders inject life into Buckeyes

By Edward Mauler Lantern sports writer 11.22.04

The Alaska Pipeline pumps barrel after barrel of crude oil to refineries throughout North America. In Ohio, the Interstate 71 pipeline drains high school football talent to the Buckeye football-guzzling city of Columbus.

As many motorists know, I-71 connects the cities of Cleveland and Columbus. What many Buckeye fans might not realize is Cleveland Glenville High School played a major role in Ohio State's dismantling of the Wolverines on Nov. 20. Three players, all starters from Glenville, are listed on the Buckeye roster, and one — Pierre Woods — played for Michigan.

"Hats off to Pierre Woods today, too," quarterback Troy Smith said about the Michigan linebacker.

Along with Smith, who started the 2001 season at quarterback for Glenville, the names Ted Ginn Jr. and Donte Whitner might ring a bell.

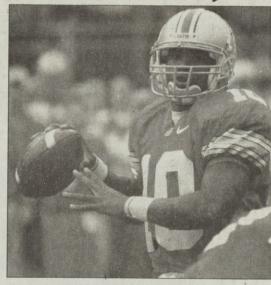

"I've been a Tarblooder for life," Ginn said after the victory over Michigan. "They know that we've got their back just like they watched us on TV and they know that all the eyes (are) on us."

The Tarblooders might be one of the more original mascots in high school football. According to a story written by sports writer Dan Clutter about mascots on the Bucyrus Telegraph-Forum Web site, the name originated from the Cleveland Glenville fans who would shout at the opposing teams during the 1940s, "We're going to whack the tar and blood out of you."

Not surprisingly, the school's colors are black

"We dreamt it a couple times," Smith said about beating Michigan with his fellow high school teammates. "Just going to the same school, Ohio State, and doing big things."

Smith's dreams might have been a premonition. His performance in the Horseshoe against the Wolverines was legendary. Twenty years from now, there is little doubt Smith's performance will be featured on PBS as a "Buckeye Classic" narrated by Buckeye-lore historian Jack Park.

MELISSA MILLER/THE LANTERN OSU quarterback and Cleveland Glenville High School alumnus Troy Smith looks for an open man during the Buckeyes' win over Michigan.

"I told him, 'That was a legendary performance you had, Troy,'" said Anthony Gonzalez, a Buckeye receiver also from Cleveland. "He fights so hard and he's the type of guy you want to play for. You want to fight for him because you know he's going to fight for you."

Smith and Ginn's performances were as big as Smith once dreamed. Each former Glenville player had a part in the four touchdowns OSU scored.

Smith tossed TD passes to wide receivers Gonzalez and Santonio Holmes and also ran for a score. Ginn's electrifying punt return for a touchdown in the third quarter was part of a stretch in the game when the Buckeyes reeled off 27 unanswered points.

"I get to watch it every day in practice," coach Jim Tressel said. "And that one (against Michigan), I don't know where that — I mean, I was shocked. (Ginn) just came out of nowhere. How many yards later? 82? Oh, Lord — 82 yards later we've got a touchdown. Ho's special."

Campus bar toasts self for 70th birthday

By Kendric C. Winters Lantern staff writer September 28, 2004

The summer of 1934 hit the Midwest like a furnace, with a drought that saddled farmers with the most anemic harvest many had seen in decades.

But at least it wasn't dry.

Prohibition died a celebrated death the year before. Combination roadhouse service stations ing time, Larry's has a stark, tansold beer for a nickel — driver and vehicle could get fueled up simultaneously.

It was in that wonderful, miserable season — just past the blackest days of the Great Depression — that Larry Paoletti bought the property at 2040 N. High St. and opened Lawrence's Italian Restaurant, a nice but nottoo-fancy place with fresh pasta, beer, wine and checkered table-

This year, Lawrence's Restaurant, now Larry's Bar, celebrates its 70th anniversary, making it the oldest drinking establishment in Ohio State's campus area.

By way of celebration, the bar has been dealing out free Larry's gear to its regulars, including Larry's shot glasses, pint glasses and bumper stickers. T-shirts were to come in a a strong possibility — maybe in things as knock over their drink. December.

Larry's.

Tucked in a dark corner, next like a displaced set piece from said. The Maltese Falcon.

One of the booths along the south wall is rigged with a hidden drawer supposedly used by pot dealers for secretive drop-offs and pickups. (A recent inspection turned up two blank Post-It Notes and an unopened condom.)

There's a bookshelf next to the bar containing about 40 titles, which include "Khrushchev: A Career" and the "1978 World Union.

Almanac and Book of Facts." Resting on top of Yahtzee and has great stories. Some tales are Scrabble is a beat-up Trivial Pursuit game with present-tense geography questions about Soviet satellite nations.

Gathering a sense of style from the environment in Larry's is like looking for fashion tips in the sediment of a stream bed.

But because the bar's flair is the debris from 70 years of flowgible identity.

Owner Jon Paoletti, Larry's grandson, possesses patience and an understanding of the business, which has shielded that identity from marketing gimmicks and makeovers. He puzzles over the attitude of bar owners who "expect they're going to get rich real fast."

Paoletti said the original restaurant morphed gradually into the bar it is now. It's not clear exactly when Lawrence's became Larry's, but he credits World War II for the initial kick toward a focus on spirits. He figures a city full of men coming back from the front lines probably wanted a beer or two.

keeps the books and manages the payroll. The spirit of the bar's endurance keeps her philosophimonth or so. Zippo lighters are cal when customers do such

> 'Hey, you're at Larry's," she she said

But there are limits.

The Paolettis keep the bar's look dynamic by offering up their south wall as free exhibition space to local artists. Every two or three weeks, the inside of Larry's gets a facelift as new work replaces old.

Liam O'Brien showed his paintings of giant rubber ducks there this year. When they came down, they went right across the street to the galleries of Ohio

Like any 70-year-old, Larry's taller than others.

One thing Jon Paoletti knows is true: folk singer Phil Ochs got his start playing the stage at Larry's in the early 1960s. Ochs' Millenium Collection album hangs in the jukebox as a reminder.

One thing Paoletti is pretty sure of: Lou Reed played at Larry's a few times before The Velvet Underground took off.

What Paoletti thinks might be true: one of the apartments over Larry's was rented in the early 1950s by "Twilight Zone" creator Rod Serling.

One persistent story is the rumor that Larry's is a gay bar.

A gay bar with anarchist glyphs gouged into the men's room wall? Maybe. A gay bar without a single disco song on the jukebox? Get real.

Richard Stelling has an explanation. Stelling's been coming to Larry's since he studied photojournalism at OSU in the 1960s.

He said when he was a student, Larry's was a haven for campus intellectuals. The crowd Jon's wife, Linda Paoletti, reveled in the wash of its own erudite discourse. Sometimes it was loud enough to drown out the jukebox.

The gay bar rumor was deliberately spread, he says frankly, to keep the frat guys out, but Stelling There's something about says. "If you can't spill a beer here says the rumor has outlived its

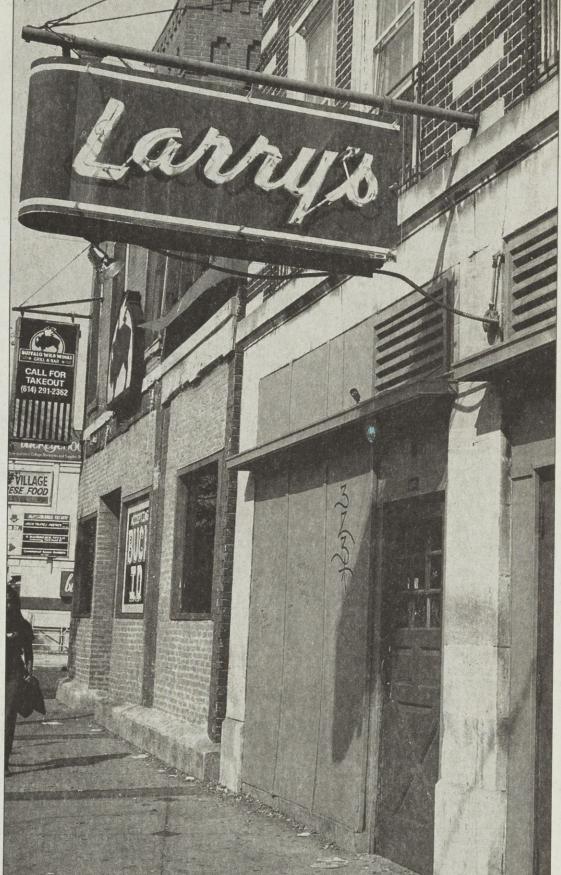

He came back to Larry's durto a Playboy pinball machine, there's a wooden phone booth peeing or sex in the booths," she ago. The discourse was not erudite. A beer bottle or two got tossed around; he didn't like it.

But can any college alumni come back to their old haunt and find the same place they left

The answer is a joke:

How many Larry's regulars does it take to screw in a light

Ten — one to change the bulb and nine to stand around and say, "It's not like the old one."

'Action Action' debut album undeserving of any action

By Lindsay Holmwood Lantern staff writer

The first track of Action Action's to this Year's Fashion" is so intensely irritating listeners might want to rip their headphones off. However, those brave enough to plow through rewarded with some diamonds in the rough.

This New York quartet creates a Who. bold and bizarre fusion of alternareminiscent of the '80s new wave genre. Though they make this odd concoction work on several songs, the rest of the album seems to be filler and does not mesh particularly well with the album's successful other.

As a whole, this first album released by Victory Records — is hardly a masterpiece because of tracks that seem mashed together and have no real consistency. The album displays creative ideas and a unique sound, but lacks the glue that would hold it all together.

The title tracks "Don't Cut Your Fabric" and "This Year's Fashion," are almost identical and it cannot be said why this band would torture its listeners twice. Of all the synthesizer phrasing on the album, these two songs display the most inappropriate and jarring use of the instrument. The band's unique sound is due in part to its liberal use of vintage keyboards including a mellotron and a Wurlitzer electric piano. "Action synth-pop rhythms with alternative Action" also got its hands on a Univox Super Fuzz, originally owned by Victory Records Web site that the Pete Townshend, which explains drug references on the album were The Who — like sound emanating refinement, the second album would
