Remodeling, Repairs and Fixed Equipment:
CAMPBELL HALL (Home Economics)
ERECTED IN 1917
In the next few months and the years that follow Campbell Hall will become a familiar building to many new home economics and agricultural students. Today, Campbell Hall is very modern and contains many well equipped classrooms and offices.

Campbell Hall has housed the School of Home Economics since September, 1916. The first Home of Domestic Science was housed in two rooms on the first floor of Hayes Hall from 1896 till 1916. As the enrollment increased in what was then called the "Domestic Science Department", the rooms in Hayes Hall did not provide sufficient space therefore, it became evident by 1912 that a new building was needed. Plans were started, and a request for an appropriation for a new building was presented to the General Assembly; but not until 1915 was the money appropriated by the legislature. Work on the building was proceeding rapidly, so that in September of 1916 the unfinished building was opened for classes. By the end of that school year, 1917, all the new equipment was installed.

At the Board of Trustees Meeting in August, 1921, on the recommendation of President Thompson, the Home Economics Building was named "Campbell Hall" in honor of Elizabeth Campbell, the deceased wife of former Governor James Edwin Campbell. As governor, and later as a University trustee, he and Mrs. Campbell had always supported financial aid for Ohio State University. So, as a tribute to them both, and because the Home Economics building was a woman's building, it bears the name of "Campbell Hall", in special honor of Elizabeth Campbell.

Campbell Hall was built anticipating future needs of Home Economics. In 1920 a cafeteria was installed as a laboratory for students majoring in institutional management. The cafeteria was open to the public and operated until 1928 when a larger cafeteria was installed in Pomerene Hall.

When Campbell Hall was built a home management apartment was located on the third floor. But as enrollment grew, it was necessary to have more space so, a house was rented on Eleventh Avenue. Also, early in the history of Campbell Hall a nursery school and a household equipment laboratory were established in Campbell Hall. Today, Campbell Hall has many new facilities which aid every Home Economics student who walks up her marble steps, and enters into her halls.

Hearty appetites for cookies and milk, and eager eyes and ears for stories, fill the basement of Campbell Hall weekdays.

The school, under the supervision of the Department of Family Relations and Human Development, is directed by Barbara Newman, associate professor in the department.

The school has two sessions daily. The morning session is under the supervision of Emily Johnson and meets from 9 a.m. to noon. The afternoon session runs from 1 p.m. to 4 p.m. and is directed by Vivien Harvey.

The instructors are assisted by undergraduate and graduate students in Home Economics education or Family Relations and Human Development.

The main purpose of the school, said Harvey, is to provide a good program for both the children and OSU students. The students benefit from experience, Harvey said, while the children benefit from social stimulation and emotional support.

The children are from the families of faculty and staff members and community residents. The fees are $53 for the morning session, which includes lunch, and $64.60 for the afternoon session.
Campaign will add space to home economics

By Toni Robino

The College of Home Economics will celebrate the beginning of a $1.5 million fund-raising campaign Feb. 23.

The New Ventures, New Visions Campaign seeks private gifts, which will be matched by University dollars, to provide the $3 million needed to construct two additions to Campbell Hall.

Campbell Hall was built in the early 1900s. Since the time of the last building addition in the late 1950s, the number of students in the college has nearly doubled.

One addition will be in the courtyard, and the other will be located on the northwest side of the building.

The addition planned for the courtyard will provide about 7,000 square feet of space for conferences, displays, storage and offices for additional faculty and staff members.

“This addition will allow for more efficient use of space,” says Lena Bailey, dean of the college. “The additions will help us toward achieving our goals of strengthened programs and services for students and faculty.”

The four-story addition proposed for the northwest side of the building will be constructed to meet the needs of other major programs in the college. One floor will be designed for a large classroom and the others will house the rapidly growing Historic Costume and Textiles Collection. Two large vaults — controlled for temperature, light and humidity — will give the more than 3,500 garments in the collection protective accommodations that rival facilities in many major museums.

The addition also will house an exhibition gallery, space to prepare exhibits, and a laboratory for restoration, conservation and research work on costumes and textiles from throughout history.

“The collection continues to build toward star status under the guidance of Charles Kleibacker, designer in residence,” says Charlotte Immke of Columbus, honorary campaign chair.

Connie Cahill of Dublin, campaign chair, explains, “The costume collection has made great advances under Charles’ direction over the past several years and really is deserving of some quality space. In addition, at present the students are not receiving the greatest possible advantage from the collection because of the way it must be stored.”

The New Ventures, New Visions Campaign is part of The Ohio State University Campaign, which seeks to raise $350 million in private gifts for selected teaching, research and student programs.
Home Ec college plans additions

The College of Home Economics launched a three year campaign Thursday at the Capital Club to raise $1.5 million to build additions to the college.

Lynda Heyl, director of development for the college, said the total cost to construct the two additions, which houses the college, is $3 million. The New Ventures, New Visions Campaign is trying to raise half the money through private donations, while the university will match the remaining half of the money.

"This addition will allow for more efficient use of space," said Lena Bailey, dean of the College of Home Economics. "The additions will help us toward achieving our goals of strengthened programs and services for students and faculty."

The additions will help solve the overcrowding problems of students and the Historic Costume and Textiles Collection, Heyl said.

The first addition will include 7,000 square-foot atrium for offices, storage and a student center on the second floor.

The second addition will be located on the northwest side of the building, she said. A four-story addition will house a large state-of-the-art classroom and two large temperature, light, and humidity-controlled vaults for the Historic Costume and Textiles Collection.

It will also include an exhibition hall, space to prepare exhibits and a laboratory for restoration, conservation and research work on costumes and textiles from throughout history, she said.

The clothing collection is under the direction of Charles Kleibacker, designer in residence.

Kleibacker said the collection contains about 4,500 items and is worth approximately $2 million. The collection is currently housed in the basement of Campbell Hall.

In May 1987, the collection was damaged by a water main break under Neil Avenue. Although he does not see a problem with flooding in the future, Kleibacker said the addition would provide safety and much needed space for the collection.

David Cummin, president of the public relations corps for the College of Home Economics and a senior majoring in nutrition said, the additions sound very constructive and will make the college more appealing to students.

"Overall, it will become a building of its own in Columbus," he said.

Connie Cahill, chairwoman for the campaign, said the New Ventures, New Visions Campaign is part of the Ohio State University Campaign, which seeks to raise $350 million in private gifts for teaching, research and student programs for the university.

"It is going to identify it (the college) as a college that is on the move, that is growing with the times, that is looking toward the future," she said.

The campaign will be looking at corporations with association to the college, alumni and foundations to contribute money and it hopes to raise the money by 1992, Heyl said.

Campbell Hall was built in the early 1900's. Since the time of the last revisions in the late 1950's, the number of students in the college has nearly doubled to 1,500 students.
"New Ventures’ will boost home economics"

Chances are, a home economist has touched your life dozens of times today. It’s likely that your clothing, your breakfast cereal, the design of your car’s interior, and your child’s daycare facility were developed using the expertise of a home economist. And they are just a few examples, said Connie Cahill, a 1970 Ohio State graduate and chairperson of the College of Home Economics New Ventures, New Visions Campaign. The campaign, which will fund the expansion of Campbell Hall, seeks to raise $1.5 million as well as awareness about home economics. The University will match funds raised dollar-for-dollar. "Few people know how far-reaching home economics is," Cahill said. "Unfortunately, for many the field conjures up images of women cooking and sewing. The magnitude of what we do now is tremendous," she said.

Cahill said that today’s home economists provide important services that significantly affect the quality of our lives. And, she said, home economics research complements many other disciplines: medicine, engineering, business, and social work are a few examples of fields that benefit from such research. Lena Bailey, dean of the College of Home Economics, said, "The demand for home economics graduates is growing at an astounding rate. An example is the Hospitality Management program—so many opportunities exist that the enrollment has skyrocketed from 35 students in 1984 to nearly 300 in 1989.

"In addition, just five years ago, enrollments have increased 105 percent for both the early childhood education and the child and family studies programs. If we are to accommodate the current and future growth, we must prepare," Bailey continued. "The last time Campbell Hall was expanded, only 600 students were enrolled in the college. Today, 30 years later, we have nearly twice that number of students using the same facilities.

"We’re an outstanding nationally respected college now," she added, "but we need adequate room and updated resources to really explore our full potential."

The Campbell Hall expansion project features two additions. One will add 7,755 square feet to the building in a second-floor atrium that will supply space for conferences, meetings, a student center, and offices for additional faculty and staff members. Immediately below, a courtyard will supply a sheltered outdoor gathering area in a space now used for deliveries. This addition will also provide a second major entrance to the building, similar in design to the existing entrance on the building’s east side.

A second addition, to be constructed on the northwest side of Campbell Hall, is designed to meet needs of other major programs in the college. The majority of this 8,000-square-foot addition will house the Historic Costume and Textiles Collection. Two large vaults—controlled for temperature, light, and humidity—will give the collection protective accommodations that rival facilities in many major museums. There will, in addition, be an exhibition gallery, space to prepare exhibits, and a laboratory for restoration, conservation, and research work on costumes and textiles throughout history. Also in the northwest addition will be a much-needed classroom that seats more than 100 students.

Honorary chair Charlotte Inman said, "The New Ventures, New Visions Campaign comes at a critical time for the college—additional space is absolutely necessary." The expansion of the Historic Costume and Textiles Collection is an excellent illustration of this need," she continued, "but initially the collection required only one small room, but the space needs have increased by nearly 400 percent."

Since its establishment in the 1940s, the collection has grown to include more than 4,500 garments worth more than $2 million. The momentum has held in recent years under the direction of designer and collection curator Charles Klotzbucher.

Dean Bailey added that growth in other segments of the college has also strained available space. She said an alumni and placement office as well as a development office have been added to the college’s services. Computers have been integrated into all departments, and a new computer lab has been installed in a renovated classroom.

"As the technology increases," she said, "so do our space requirements."

The New Ventures, New Visions Campaign is the cornerstone of the College of Home Economics fundraising efforts. Other goals include $1.25 million for a faculty chair in hospitality management, $350,000 for an endowed professorship in textiles and clothing, and $150,000 for an endowment to support the Historic Costume and Textiles Collection.

At a kick-off event in late February attended by volunteers and other alumni and friends of the college, Connie Cahill referred to the campaign as "a challenge, but possible. It acknowledges our future as a healthy, viable, and relevant college within Ohio State."

"Will the effort be worth it?" she asked. "Positively, I believe in the college because of all the wonderful students. This is our chance to give something back. Making sure we are investing in the future is what this campaign is all about."

Cahill said.

COLUMBIA GAS FOUNDATION GIVES $100,000 TO HUMAN ECOLOGY CAMPAIGN

COLUMBUS -- A $100,000 gift from the Columbia Gas Foundation to The Ohio State University College of Human Ecology will be used to help build a center for student and alumni activities.

The new center will be part of a much-needed expansion of 75-year-old Campbell Hall, the location of the College of Human Ecology (formerly the College of Home Economics).

"The field of human ecology encompasses a broad array of studies -- such as hospitality management, home management, and consumer affairs -- that are very related to the concerns of our customers," said C. Ronald Tilley, chairman and chief executive officer of Columbia Gas Distribution Companies. "We are responding to the critical space needs that affect the college's programs."

This is the second $100,000 commitment to Ohio State by Columbia Gas. The previous gift supported scholarships and faculty enrichment programs in several areas throughout the university.

The Campbell Hall project is the focus of the College of Human Ecology's "New Ventures, New Visions" campaign, which seeks to raise $1.5 million from private sources to be matched by the university. The expansion will include two major additions to provide space for a large classroom, meeting rooms, faculty and staff offices, and growing Historic Costume and Textile Collection.

Lena Bailey, dean of the College of Human Ecology, said, "This commitment from Columbia Gas is a strong indication of corporate support for our programs and our alumni. We are all appreciative of the private sector's joining the college to increase space and strengthen programs."

HUMAN ECOLOGY CAMPAIGN EXCEEDS GOAL, RAISES $1.6 MILLION

COLUMBUS -- The successful completion of The Ohio State University College of Human Ecology's $1.5 million New Ventures/New Visions fund-raising campaign was announced Friday (12/13) by Lena Bailey, dean of the college.

In making the announcement, Bailey said the campaign, begun in 1989 with the goal of raising funds to build two new additions to Campbell Hall, the college's home, had raised $1,621,436. The university will provide matching funds to complete the project, Bailey said.

A campaign steering committee, headed by alumna Connie Cahill and honorary chair Charlotte Immke, spearheaded the successful fund-raising effort. The success of the campaign, to a large degree, was the result of tremendous volunteer effort, Bailey said.

Campaign central committees paved the way for numerous major gifts as well as solicitation of all alumni of the college. Approximately 400 volunteers throughout Ohio assisted in the campaign, and alumni in 45 counties conducted mini campaigns within the overall effort.

Chairpersons of the major committees were: Bea Cleveland, advance gifts; Mary Ann Krauss, major gifts; Dorothy Teater, corporate gifts; Catherine Clark, college gifts; Velma Everhart, recognition; and Lillian Schoephoerster, crew team.

In addition to alumni, many friends of the college also took part -- most notably the Friends of the Historic Costume and Textiles Collection.

"We are grateful to the many alumni, friends, foundations and corporate supporters of this project and to the hundreds of volunteers throughout the state who helped with its completion," Bailey said. "The new space provided by these additions will allow our students, faculty and staff to carry out the excellent programs offered in the College of Human Ecology."

The project will add over 15,000 square feet to Campbell Hall, and will include a student and alumni center, faculty meeting lounge, student lounge, storage vaults, a laboratory, and gallery space for the Historic Costume and Textiles Collection. Also included will be a large state-of-the-art classroom, faculty office space, reception areas, and restrooms. The facility will be built in two sections, one on the northwest corner of Campbell Hall, and the second in a cul-de-sac behind the building that is currently used for deliveries.

Architects Kellam and Associates of Columbus and Thomas T. K. Zung of Cleveland have begun the design phase of the project. Groundbreaking is projected for 1992 with building completion in 1994.

NEWS ADVISORY:
COLLEGE OF HUMAN ECOLOGY TO HOLD GROUNDBREAKING
FOR CAMPBELL HALL ADDITION

The Ohio State University College of Human Ecology will hold a groundbreaking ceremony on Friday, June 3, to kick off construction of an addition to Campbell Hall, the college's home and the location of the Historic Costume and Textiles Collection. The event will begin at 3 p.m. in the parking lot off 12th Avenue behind Campbell Hall, 1787 Neil Ave.

Jerelyn B. Schultz, dean of the College of Human Ecology will make opening remarks. Also speaking will be Ohio State President E. Gordon Gee, as well as leaders of the college's building campaign, and the architects. At 3:30 p.m., the speakers will participate in a ceremonial groundbreaking in the area on the north side of Campbell Hall.

The College of Human Ecology's New Ventures, New Visions Campaign raised over $1.62 million in private funds toward the $3 million building addition, which will add 19,000 square feet to the existing structure.

The addition, which will extend between Campbell Hall and Lazenby Hall to the north, will include a student and alumni center, faculty and student lounges, classrooms, faculty offices, reception areas, and a courtyard. The major feature will be the Geraldine Schottenstein Wing of the Historic Costume and Textiles Collection, which will house the 7,000-piece collection, with space for research and teaching.

For further information, or to arrange a tour of the Historic Costume and Textiles Collection, please contact Karen Wheel, director of development for the College of Human Ecology, at (614) 292-6761.
Man nearly loses arm in construction site accident

By Greg Sowinski
Lantern staff writer

A campus construction worker nearly lost his arm after falling 14 feet into a Campbell Hall construction trench.

Roger Ruth, 59, a construction worker for Paul Vlack Company Inc., was taken to the OSU Medical Center after falling from the top of a stack of I-beams, Ruth said from his hospital bed.

Ruth said he was walking on top of the stack which had been placed in a truck bed when one of the beams began to roll. He lost his balance and fell 14 feet into the L-shaped trench at the corner of the building, landing on his back.

Ruth's left arm was pinned by a 10-foot-long beam, trapping him in the hole, he said.

Loose gravel in the trench allowed Ruth's arm to sink into the ground, lessening the impact and preventing the beam from cutting off his arm, said OSU Police Chief Ron Michalec.

Ruth was stuck in the 4-by-6-foot hole in a semi-fetal position while the beam was propped over him, Michalec said.

The fire department used a construction crane to lift the 1000-pound beam off of Ruth's arm. Rescue workers then lowered a basket into the hole to recover Ruth.

Ruth was taken to the OSU Medical Center where he is listed in fair condition, a hospital spokeswoman said.

He has no broken bones, just a deep gash in his left arm and lots of bruises. Ruth said he expects to be released from the hospital today.

THE NEW ADDITION TO CAMPBELL HALL

Today's dedication festivities highlight both new and renovated space within Campbell Hall, home to the College of Human Ecology since 1916. This expansion on the building's north side adds a three-story structure containing the Geraldine Schottenstein Wing for the Historic Costume and Textiles Collection; the Columbia Gas Student and Alumni Center; and enhanced administrative office space including a conference area named in honor of Lena Bailey, dean emeritus of the College of Human Ecology.

The building's main entrance, relocated to the north side of the building, features a handsome arched portico beneath a glass and mirror façade. This entrance leads directly to the first floor of the Historic Costume and Textiles Gallery, which is continued on the second floor. Adjacent to the first floor gallery is the costume and textile restoration laboratory and a curator's office.

The Student and Alumni Center, adjacent to the gallery's upper floor, is already a popular gathering place for students, faculty and visitors, with its serene colors, comfortable furniture, and open upper balcony area. Located on the second level are separate lounges and meeting spaces for students and faculty, and a state of the art lecture hall. The third floor houses several administrative suites and a conference room.

The building addition added 19,427 square feet to the existing structure and provided for the renovation of 2,314 square feet. The cost of this project was borne in part by the state of Ohio; however, $2 million, more than half the total cost, was raised by the College of Human Ecology's New Ventures/New Visions Campaign, demonstrating the great generosity of many individuals, corporations and foundations.

BENEFACTORS

Many gifts to the College of Human Ecology New Ventures/New Visions Campaign honor individuals, corporations and foundations through named components of the building addition. Those named gifts and their donors include:

- The Geraldine Schottenstein Wing of the Historic Costume and Textiles Collection
  - Geraldine and the late Jerome Schottenstein
