ralph eaton -REFERENCE

REFERENCE: Words are thought to take on meaning in a variety of ways. A common sense approach is that words have some sort of direct relation to the things they signify; their reference. But other ontological theories have anything like a direct relation. In Saussurean theories, all words are thought to have meaning strictly because of their positions in which they find themselves with no reference at all to anything outside language. Wittgenstein references the fact in denied altogether, which is what makes impossible or abstraction to exist. Heideggerian semantics, in contrast, argues that all words and concepts have meanings determined by their relations to their referents. i.e., the sign resembles the referent, or is an icon; if not, it is a symbol. Existential phenomenology will find the present, as well as the past, to be
